Mariana Langley is an artist and textile designer who grew up painting in her family's studio, assisting on projects including an architectural mural for the American Wing at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. She considers the art of drawing a prelude to understanding, a way to examine the surface appearances of things and to discover underlying essence. She is currently fortunate to see her designs come to life on a rich array of silks and linens, working closely with Lily Lewin, the founder and visionary behind textile and fashion house Tulicarpa. Mariana holds a BA in Liberal Arts from Thomas Aquinas College, and a MA in Textile Design from Savannah College of Art and Design.
